variation. The emphasis on the aesthetic in the very first paragraph: "Whatever tends to make the world happier and better is of direct material value though its value may not be measurable in dollars", is a little out of the ordinary for a purely economic paper, but is a good innovation. The many papers now being published dealing with the purely economic point of view have a tendency to over-emphasize the "dollars and cents value" at the expense of other values.

The introductory divisions of the bulletin treat of the usual subjects to be found in papers of its kind: The Balance of Nature, Rescue of Crops, Foliage and Forests by Birds; and Necessity of Protection. Two divisions a little more out of the ordinary are entitled: Quantities of Food Required by Birds, and Methods of Investigation.

The systematic discussion makes up the greater part of the paper. A general discussion of the food of the more important groups (orders) of birds is given with more detailed results of the stomach examination of the most important members of each group.

Two things are noticeable in this discussion. First, the numerous citations of the literature quoted (208 in all), and second, the tables (ten of them) summarizing the results of the stomach examinations made by different investigators. A few paragraphs on the literature of economic ornithology and a bibliography of one hundred and forty-nine papers on economic ornithology concludes the bulletin.

We recommend this paper as being the best brief summary on the subject which has come to our notice. No more valuable bulletin is available for the teacher who desires to know something of the economic relations of our common birds and the available literature on the subject, or for the beginning student in economic ornithology who desires a general idea of the work accomplished.—H. C. BRYANT.
